I have known Nolan Grady for the past three years. He is a kind, smart, mature, energetic and determined young man. I have no doubt that he will excel in college and he will succeed in his post-college life, no matter what his career choice may be.

I first met Nolan three year ago when he was assigned to my U.S. History class as a freshman. He was a young boy full of energy, but always eager to learn. He was attentive in class and always respectful of his peers and teacher. He did quite well in class and was able to analyze and convey what he learned into first-rate papers and exam answers.

Nolan continued with his history studies and with me by taking A.P. History his junior year. I first noticed at that time that he had matured as a young man. Although still energetic, gone was the silliness and restless energy that is so common of young adolescent boys. He also matured in his writing and his thought process. He was more than able to grasp and apply all of the material covered and he excelled in A.P. History as was reflected in his grades. He was able to engage in relevant and thought-provoking discussions on any history topic. It is obvious that he possesses intelligence and the maturity to reflect on what he has learned.
